Summary report on

“PAEDIATRIC ADVANCED LIFE SUPPORT”

In contrast to adults, cardiac arrest in children in infants and children does not usually result from a primary cardiac cause. More commonly it is the final result of terminal respiratory failure and shock, also called asphyxial arrest. Asphyxia begins with a variable period of systemic hypoxemia, hypercapnia and acidosis, progresses to bradycardia and hypotension, culminating in cardiac arrest. The following course enables the post graduate students to understand the basics of PALS course, and they could apply the same during their postings in the casualty and in day-to-day practice.

Resource persons:

Dr B Venkatachalam has been working as the Professor and HOD of Paediatrics department, and has been instrumental in arranging all the demonstration cases and simulation-based training modules. He was supported by two other resource persons, Dr K Raja Shekhar Rao and Dr M Suma Priya in training the students in small groups and clarifying their doubts raised.
